We were staying with a large party at Thornton Court, at the beginning of the pleasant shoting season, when I heard an account of an optical delusion, which is of such a novel character that I can hardly suppose it will not be interesting to many people. The ladies had gone, or at least example in the arm chair by the fire. The were supposed to have gone to bed; for I have often, on my way back to the smoking-room, at an heur when all but a few confirmed lovers of the weed are believed to be asleep in a country house, heard to be steep in a country house, heard the severe exercise of the afternoon told remained to a sin term to a pice of French composition, attempt on a pice of French composition, three himself on the sofa and in a few minutes was fast asleep. One incident which smused us much at the time I may mention en passant. The village in which Dr. Warnborough's rectory was situated abounded with eats, against which we two boys declared a war of extermination. Many fell before our air-guns (boughtsurreptitiously at an iron-monger's in the neighboring town) before the bright idea struck me of making a rug of their skins; but the idea when it did come up in my not over-well stocked brain, was regarded, both by myself and Charles, as quite equal to Watt's conception of the steam engine, or, what interested us more, the invention of air-guns. Naturally my idea was soon acted upon; the next cat that we killed was skinned with our pocket-knives, the body buried, and all seemed well, when a new difficulty arose. How were the skins to be dried? It would not be safe to place them in any of the outhouses, for the doctor might find them, and would lecture us on what would appear to him expalty athrough the myself and the my and would lecture us on what would appears to him expalty athrough the mich and could have been found in the whole army, for One incident which amused us much at I attributed his restiveness to a desire to
